An automated sampling and quantitation procedure was developed for flow injection analysis coupled to a microchip packed column (FCI-MC) for the determination of estradiol in pharmaceutical formulations. A process of operation and optimization of the preconcentration and sample introduction was performed. Validation of the method was performed by comparing data obtained by the proposed method with those obtained by HPLC-UV. Regression analysis revealed a correlation coefficient of 0.999 and a good determination coefficient of 0.997 for the calibration curves obtained with a combination of rinsing with 25% formic acid and elution using ethanol. Optimization conditions for the FCI-MC methodology were established. It was concluded that preconcentration and a subsequent wash with 25% formic acid in the optimized sample loop will make the optimization of the sample introduction procedure on the FCI-MC practically simpler. Additionally, the protocol is robust and provides satisfactory quantitation and accuracy with the presented method. Finally, the FCI-MC methodology was validated for use in a pharmaceutical application and its accuracy and repeatability was demonstrated for the determination of estradiol in a placebo sample.International forex community!
